ROOSEVELT'S ERROR

We cannot conceive of anything more unfortunate for the cause which President Roosevelt represents—the cause of freeing the American people from the evils of the partnership between professional politicians and special interests—than his bold declaration that he means to make Secretary Taft the Republican candidate for president, and that to accomplish his purpose he will virtually relieve the secretary of war from performing his official duties and keep him hard at work in the canvass for delegates during the next fifteen or sixteen months.

Nobody will dispute both the right and the propriety of Secretary Taft's ambition to be president. This is an honorable ambition, open to every worthy citizen of the United States. No one will deny him the privilege of presenting his claims for his party's nomination. This field also is free to all Republicans of parts and distinction. But it is an entirely different matter for a president of the United States to decline to stand for another term himself, but to declare frankly, in effect, that he intends to name his successor. This is the province neither of President Roosevelt nor of any other person exercising great authority and power. It is the function and the duty of the voting members of the Republican party to pick their candidate, as it is the function and the duty of all the American people to select the successor of Mr. Roosevelt to be president of the United States.

The voters of this country have expected President Roosevelt, they have as good as asked him, to continue to help them to resist the efforts of the special interests to name our representatives and senators and to control our government; but they have not asked him, they ask no man, to exercise for them the function which is theirs—that of choosing their chief executive as well as their representatives in congress.

It is no more abhorrent to the eternal ethical question and to the vital political principle involved to have President Roosevelt, exercising his power of office, fill the chair of the chief magistrate of the nation after him, than to have the Standard Oil company, the railway combine, and the industrial trusts do the same thing, though undoubtedly he would put a better man in the White House than they and would people congress with more useful public officials. But there is nothing which could more weaken our national character and hamstring our capacity for self-government than to have any man, whether representing political authority or financial power or the mere instruments of corruption, decree, as Diaz does for Mexico, who must follow in the chair of president.

President Roosevelt must abandon his resolve to name his successor if he desires our political institutions and our system of government by the people to survive. He must leave this work of choosing a candidate to the members of the Republican party throughout the United States. It must always be left there, as the selection of the chief magistrate must be left to the electors at large, unless we are to concede that our theories of independent government are an utter failure and that we are to begin an era of a sort of hereditary personal sovereignty, wherein a Roosevelt decrees a Taft as his residuary legatee, and Taft somebody else as his residuary legatee, and thus with the next and so on down through history.

Now, the American people, whatever they are to become in the future, are not ready to abdicate governing by the people. It is against this very thing they have fought in supporting Mr. Roosevelt against the autocratic and despotic Rockefeller, Harriman and Ryans, who would pick our rulers and decree their length of service. Mr. Roosevelt has a different motive for seeking to perform this function that belongs only to the people, but its effect must be precisely the same—to devitalize our political principles and to debauch our national ideals.

Dog Master to the Man

Late every afternoon, on an upper West Side street, a lonely, forlorn looking little man may be seen to issue forth from a large apartment with a small, fat poodle in tow. Or, rather, the dog has the man in tow, for the dog does all the leading. The line by which the man is attached to the dog is a heavy woven cord of blue silk. A gold-plated collar, tied with blue and yellow ribbon, ornaments the dog's neck. Wherever the dog leads the man follows patiently. Patiently the little man follows his master while the latter pursues his royal way along the street. Patiently the little man waits while the dog pauses to sniff at a garbage can and carries to sniff at a stranger's heel. "Yep, it's a sad sight, ain't it?" agreed the corner policeman the other day. "Poor devil comes out and lets that dog drag him around about this time every day, and he's been doing that now for near to a year. Ain't it a shame? They tell me he's just about a valet to that dog. Course it's his wife's. One time, they tells me, she give him orders to bathe the dog. He socks the dog into a tub, turns the cold water on him and commences scrubbin' the dog with laundry soap. His wife hears the dog's howls. She runs in, yells bloody murder and grabs the dog away from him. She calls him a brute and carries the dog away in her arms, calling the beast 'lovely pet' and all them sort of names."

"Well, they tells me she's got all the money and I've always heard that them as marries for money earns it."—New York Sun.

Gets One Cent

Ex-Postmaster James Holgate, of Chinlella, has received a treasury draft from Washington for one cent, the amount found to be due him on balancing the account. He intends to frame the draft as a souvenir of his triumph in a contest with the postoffice department.

A postoffice inspector made a report for the period from October 1, 1901, to January 30, 1903, recommending that Holgate be paid $10 a quarter in lieu of compensation computed on the cancellation of stamps, on the ground that there was a discrepancy in the amount of stamps cancelled.

Holgate demanded an investigation, and Thomas H. Dale, when he was in congress, took the matter up, making twenty visits to the postoffice department, till finally it was found that the inspector was in error. The department made the matter right by sending Holgate the balance of one cent due him, instead of surcharging him $84.21.—Special dispatch to Philadelphia North American.
